Abstract

The first national archives building in Taiwan will open in the winter of 2025. Managing records and archives to preserve national memories is the primary mission of the National Archive Administration and the National Development Council. However, implementing up-to-date information technologies to facilitate its digital transformation is another story. This study tends to identify the crucial elements regarding how archivists cope with their roles in the epoch-making period before the archives' grand opening by analyzing the organization's service announcement and ongoing programs. By summarizing and comparing the progress of digitization in the United States, the United Kingdom, and Australia, some constructive and beneficial suggestions were inducted for the new archival institution's operations in the near future.
